

exchange and protection of confidential information? If so, how? If not, why not?

10. What form of agreement(s) would best achieve the goal of enhanced enforcement cooperation? Should such agreements be negotiated on a bilateral or another basis?

Exchange of Confidential Information—Criminal Enforcement Matters

The United States is party to 19 bilateral mutual assistance treaties in criminal matters (MLATs), under which it can request assistance in obtaining information, including confidential information, from its MLAT partners for use in U.S. criminal antitrust enforcement investigations and litigation. This paper (or papers) could consider the following.

11. What has been the United States' experience in seeking assistance for criminal antitrust matters under its MLATs? For those jurisdictions that are party to bilateral antitrust agreements with the United States but not to MLATs, is there any meaningful difference in the assistance that can be provided? With the goal of enhanced cooperation in mind, how might the United States encourage antitrust authorities in other jurisdictions to change restrictions in their laws so that existing (or future) MLATs with such countries may extend to antitrust matters?

12. The United States also encounters obstacles when seeking extradition from abroad of defendants to U.S. antitrust actions. In what way can the United States encourage foreign countries to lower their barriers to providing the United States with extradition assistance in antitrust matters? Provide examples and an analysis of successes or frustrations in U.S. efforts to seek extradition assistance from abroad in connection with a U.S. criminal antitrust matter.

Transnational Cartels

The topics below are intended to be addressed in separate essays.

13. This paper should consider the incidence of transnational cartels. What does the empirical evidence suggest is the impact that transnational cartels have on the United States' economy and on U.S. business interests? This paper should also compare the nature and effect of transnational cartels and of cartel enforcement in the U.S. today with earlier periods. This paper might also explore whether the structure of international markets has changed so that international cartels are more likely to be detected now than in earlier periods. Finally, this paper should assess what recent evidence suggests about the relative economic significance, in terms of cartel structure and welfare losses, of transnational versus domestic cartel arrangements.

14. Is there any evidence that weak antitrust or competition policy enforcement is producing environments that are home to international cartels? Are there global markets or market structures that are likely to foster cartel arrangements? Or more generally, are there market or structural factors that can be identified as associated with domestic or international cartel formation and operations, and are there any differences between the two?

15. Hard Core Cartels. This paper will comment on whether it is necessary or useful to have a common international understanding about what constitutes a "hard core cartel", both domestically and internationally, and on how the term should be defined. This paper would consider the potential for cooperation under existing bilateral or international instruments (e.g., bilateral accords and OECD Recommendations, among others), and assess next steps under these agreements. Further, this paper would make suggestions for enhanced enforcement cooperation between the United States and foreign jurisdictions in enforcement efforts against hard core cartels. These suggestions would include recommendations for positive incentives the United States might offer to foreign jurisdictions as encouragement for them to alert the United States to hard core cartel activities that are affecting the United States.
